What we usually specify as the historical novel, however, began in the nineteenth century with Sir Walter Scott. The historical novel not only takes its setting and some characters and events from history, but makes the historical events and issues crucial for the central characters and narrative. Some of the greatest historical novels also use the protagonists and actions to reveal what the author regards as the deep forces that impel the historical process. Examples of historical novels are Scott's Ivanhoe (1819), set in the period of Norman domination of the Saxons at the time of Richard I; Dickens's A Tale of Two Cities (1859), in Paris and London during the French Revolution; George Eliot's Romola (1863), in Florence during the Renaissance; Tolstoy's War and Peace (1869), during Napoleon's invasion of Russia; and Margaret Mitchell's Gone with the Wind (1937), in Georgia during the Civil War and Reconstruction.
